The talk will concentrate on using genetic algorithms not only for predicting structure but also for understanding complex ordering problems in the solid state. These appear to be remarkably successful, the reasons for which are not yet completely clear. As well as model systems, examples will include metallic alloys and solid solutions of binary oxides, carbonates, garnets and oxide surfaces including cases where these methods have revealed new unexpected medium-range orderings previously unrecognised.